

The oak has its own thoughts
& jots them down on every leaf, green ink on green—invisible.

But if you stand beneath it,
Looking up through foliage into the sun,
You can almost read
The spidery, convoluted script.

I've seen the wind spend hours up there
Turning those little pages,
Now & then coming upon phrases
So eloquent, so wise
They take its breath away.